

Burnout During Burn Season: How to Keep the Fire Without Getting Consumed

BY JODI CONNORS-HARRINGTON

Introduction: The Nature of Our Business

There's no denying it: If you've been in or around the hearth industry for any amount of time, you know it follows a clear "seasonal rhythm"—with intense highs and slower lows. The "busy season" has long been a way of life for many in this field, working hard and burning hot through the colder months when demand peaks, knowing the inevitable slow season will eventually arrive.

Over the years, many industry leaders have found creative ways to "keep the fire burning" year-round—expanding into other services or markets to reduce the impact of seasonality. It's a strategy that helps keep staff employed and money flowing, even in the off months. And while this approach comes with plenty of advantages, it also carries the risk of turning the temporary hustle of burn season into a constant way of life.

After all, it's the only pace that many of us have ever known. But in our efforts to sustain the heat, have we forgotten to build in an off-season? And in doing so, are we—along with our teams—burning too hot for it to last?

If you just answered "yes" to either—or both—of

"But in our efforts to sustain the heat, have we forgotten to build in an off-season? And in doing so, are we—along with our teams—burning too hot for it to last?"

these questions, then here's some good news: Burnout is recognizable, treatable, and preventable. This article will help you recognize the warning signs in both your team and yourself, provide practical strategies for addressing burnout when it appears, and offer concrete steps to prevent it from happening in the first place.

Recognizing Burnout

Understanding the signs of burnout is a crucial skill when managing a team. Burnout doesn't always look loud—sometimes it's silent, showing up as disengagement. A newer term that's been circulating is "quiet quitting," which refers to employees who fulfill their basic responsibilities but stop going above and beyond. It's essentially doing the minimum required to keep the job, without putting in extra time, energy, or enthusiasm. While it's often framed as a push for better work-life balance, quiet quitting can also be a direct result of workplaces failing to recognize and address burnout when it first appears.

The signs to watch for in your team members may seem small or easy to overlook—but left unaddressed, they can turn even your top performers into quiet quitters. A drop in morale, increased irritability, declining productivity, absenteeism, and snippy attitudes are just a few red flags. If any of these start surfacing, it might be time to step back and consider a strategy to make sure your team isn't burning out.

But what about the person in the mirror? Personal burnout can be one of the hardest to recognize—especially if you're the type who always prioritizes hard work above everything else. Remember, as a leader, the way you handle stress sets the tone for your whole team. If you never rest, it's likely they won't either.

With that in mind, self-awareness is the first step toward change. Take an honest look at your daily work habits and ask yourself if any of these resonate: loss of motivation, exhaustion that sleep doesn't fix, cynicism, resentment toward customers or team members, or decision fatigue. Any of these can be signs of personal burnout—or at the very least, warning signs that you're heading in that direction.

Simply put, addressing your own burnout is one of the most important steps you can take to ensure your team stays healthy and on the right track. After all, the danger of being a leader who "pushes through no matter what" is that it becomes contagious. Leaders set the tone—so if you never rest, your team won't either.

Treating Burnout

Now that you've recognized the signs, where do you begin tackling the problem? For your team, start by creating space for open conversations and fostering a safe environment where employees feel comfortable acknowledging how they're really doing. Normalize talking about mental load—it can be just as overwhelming as physical exhaustion. This can also help prevent unhealthy comparisons between departments (for example, installers or service techs assuming sales or office staff don't work as hard, and vice versa).

No matter the exact approach you take to treating burnout, here's the biggest thing to remember: Show you care with tangible actions, not just words. Schedule mental health check-ins, offer flexible hours where possible, bring in meals or small surprise perks, and rotate high-pressure responsibilities so the weight isn't falling on just one or two people. Just as importantly, make sure there's a space where employees can safely speak up if their workload feels too heavy. Encourage the team to come up with solutions together, whether that means delegating, automating, or reworking responsibilities. The goal is to grow together and create healthy, lasting change.

Leaders set the tone — so if you never rest,
your team won't either.

When it comes to your own burnout, that self-awareness you've developed is the first big hurdle, which means you're already on your way! It's important to treat burnout like an injury: If you don't address it, you'll limp through your work and things will only worsen over time.

The key is developing a personal action plan that addresses burnout at its source. Take the time to recognize what fuels you—both as a leader and as a human being—versus what drains you, and adjust accordingly. Schedule real downtime doing things that are non-work related and truly fill your cup. Reassess your boundaries around screen time, client communication, and after-hours commitments, and look for the gaps where burnout might be seeping in. If needed, take a step back to see the big picture again. Reconnect with your “why”—and if you have mentors or friends in a similar position, talk with them.

You're likely not alone in feeling this way. But the most important thing to remember is that taking care of yourself isn't selfish—it's essential to leading well and lasting long in this industry.

Preventing Burnout

Once burnout is recognized and addressed, prevention becomes the natural next step. Preventing burnout starts with being intentional about how you structure your year. Build recovery into the rhythm of your business—schedule cool-down periods, even during peak season, and plan for energy, not just profit.

This might mean scheduling mandatory time off during slower periods, setting realistic project timelines that include buffer time, or establishing “no-meeting” days during your busiest weeks. Consider implementing systems that can run without constant oversight—whether that's automated scheduling, standardized processes, or cross-training team members so responsibilities can be shared.

Just as you create systems to support your team, you need to build sustainable practices for yourself as a leader. Set a realistic pace and don't be afraid to automate or delegate with trust, remembering that you don't have to carry the whole load

A woman with dark hair, wearing a light pink cardigan, is sitting on the floor and smiling while using a silver laptop. She is in a cozy living room with a fireplace in the background, where a fire is burning. The room has warm lighting and a window with curtains. A quote is overlaid on the right side of the image.

“Plan for energy,
not just profit.”

“You can burn bright without burning out”

alone. Model a healthy work-life balance so your team knows it's not only allowed—it's expected. Ask yourself regularly: What would sustainable success actually look like here?

Remember, in an industry built around providing warmth and comfort to others, we must extend that same care to our teams and ourselves. The most successful hearth businesses are those that can maintain their heat season after season, not those that burn brightest for a single year.

Conclusion: The Sustainable Fire

Burnout is real, but it doesn't have to be your story every season. In an industry that runs hot for months at a time, it's easy to believe the only way forward is to keep pushing. But the truth is that you can burn bright without burning out—if you're intentional about how you manage your energy and lead your team.

The goal isn't to avoid the heat altogether. There will always be seasons that demand more from us. But learning to recognize when it's time to step back and cool down is what makes that heat sustainable. If you want to make a lasting impact—for yourself and for those around you—you need to protect both your energy and your team's capacity to thrive.

So here's the challenge: Where can you cool the flame just a little this week? Even small adjustments can make a big difference. Give yourself permission to rest and recharge—because sustained fire doesn't come from constant fuel. It comes from knowing when to pause, breathe, and rebuild your strength.

After all, recognizing, treating, and preventing burnout isn't just about surviving the season—it's about building a business that can thrive year after year.